Folkestone Bayle. A hippopotamus skeleton was discovered during an archaeological rescue excavation prior to a development at the Bayle, Folkstone in 1989. Comprising the remnants of a River Hippopotamus, a large part of its articulated lower jaw, vertebrae and pelvis, lay in what has previously been described as the Bayle Bone bed since its identification in the mid nineteenth century. Consisting of an extensive array of deposits dating back to the palaeolithic period, approximately 400,000 years ago, this previously overlooked site is of significant scientific importance, with the presence of the remains of numerous other animals, none of which survive in this environment after the post glacial period.

1989

Description: A large, complete half section of pelvis measuring 530mm across from Iliac crest to the base of the pubic symphysis, the acetabulum measures 150mm in diameter. This pelvic section was block lifted and is currently displayed in a bandage wrapped base and situated on top of a block of parent soil.

1989

Description: A BPWF 89 23 BFq, Pelvis unboxed previously identified section of pelvis, presumed to be the opposite side to that in Box 1. This portion of bone is largely fragmented, and this exposed face holds little to no anatomically identifying features. It measures 510mm across horizontally, mirroring the width seen in the previous pelvic bone (Box. 1) and likewise bandage wrapped base and situated on top of a block of parent soil.

1989

Description: A large section of the hippopotamus's lower jaw identifiable by the largely intact canines (tusks) protruding from the jaw section. At a length of 440mm, the canines can be identified as belonging to the lower jaw due to the upper incisors being smaller in length and protruding at differing angles (the lower canines are used as weapons due to their size). This is bound with a bandage wrapped base and situated on top of a block of parent soil.
